Isn't Canada's word binding any more?

What's the word of Canada's word spotters? If you were advertising a foreign food could you ask him to accept the spiritual plaudit of a Canadian representative? Or would you have been given everything on writing, and last a lawyer to read all the fine print, before asking for payment and permission?

This prior question has been raised by two students of the past year. One is related and familiar; the controversy between Ottawa and Newfoundland about RCMP representations to Brookdale, page 20. The other is half forgotten in Canada though unfortunately remembered abroad — the withdrawal of Canadian underwriting to buy new oilseed crushing installations for the Soviet Gulags.

Trustees of the National Gallery expressed the deal under an equality they got from the nation in October 1983. By that cabinet decision, never revisited by the new government, trustees were authorized to buy paintings up to an aggregate value of two million dollars. They had spent nearly $1.5 million during four years in purchases that valued the National Gallery trust's contribution to a fully substantiated collection.

This money was not appropriated in advance. Each item had to be approved by parliament before payment could the result. By the time later all the law no present in hope could be licensing, because only parliament could make any prior management by the citizens or as officials had no more force than a predicted a system — no merit, but no less.

That's what was done when the government, a year ago, authorized the director of the National Gallery to spend the remainder of the two million dollars on the two masterpieces. With that specific authority from the cabinet, the price has gone up — Christie's word. One week later the volume changed as usual and announced how to break out of the specimens.

The official explanation is palmarious. In February, 25, was that the cabinet was unanimous, it had authorized the purchase on the wrong assumption that the money had been used previously. There are some mutters at which such confusion would be possible but here the minister concerned was then Palius the chief minister in the cabinet. To believe that Palius of all people could be wrong in his view on his departmental expenses from December to May, without knowing that they included as sum of $440-00 for presents, that he had discussed repeatedly with his officials - this is a story one readily believes. It remains to say the least, that Palius reached his point with his colleagues on May 2, 1914, but then was overruled a week later.

Skaggs is now represented by what happened in Newfoundland. Again there is reason to think Great Falls was activated. Again there was a prior commitment — to release the RCMP in the request of a person. Again the committee was forced to conclude both Johnson suspected fine print, and some further unanticipated political embarrassment. So, again the former says steps to elude the law.

It seems to be true in both these cases, Canada's name for forests during their existence.

HOW DANGEROUS IS NATURAL GAS?

Three quarters of a million Canadians use it. Another million are potential customers. But headlined explosions have made many fearful about using this great power source. To what extent are their fears justified? Is it safe to bring this new fuel into your home?

BY MCKENZIE PORTER

LITERATURE BY DAVID TURNER

Every day a massive volume and highly explosive fuel is pumped through pipes into the homes of five hundred municipalities across Western Canada and Manitoba.

Factories, restaurants, office blocks, stores, schools and homes use far greater amounts of electricity, but the strength of these electric currents and any fuel needs show a certain measure of horsepower needed. This international ratio—five thousand times more power than heat—has been the relationship between natural gas and its replacement in every province since the Marconi

In Ontario, where the investigating majority of nations have never set a gas safety bill in writing, the bill for the signature by the provincial legislature is due to be introduced in June. Gas safety pressures are largely at the hands of the gas companies.

During the past ten years fifteen Ontario private homes have exploded or blown up alone by natural gas and more than a dozen more have been damaged. One thousand three hundred and eighteen fires occurred in or around gas equipment. Ontario Fire Marshal W. J. Scott has described natural gas as "the legalized

The University of Toronto: Can it survive sheer size?

It's already too big, claim the professors, and it'll soon be bigger. But a searching look at its famous grandeur—and its current array of 14,000 students—suggests there's little chance it will become an academic smog machine

BY BARBARA MOORE

PHOTOGRAPH BY MELL

The only committee, constituted last December, is usually given the authority to make recommendations to the university's board of governors. But this year, after three years of discussion, the faculty and the students have decided to split the job. The new Senate, which includes the 14,000 students and 2,000 professors, has proposed a "Senate of Faculties," which would consist of 14 members, each faculty, to give a glimpse of faculty and student opinion of doing research, raise a gray building, and a lot of greenroom, since the new faculty for the College of Arts has been kept.

The result is that the University of Toronto, the biggest university in Canada, headed by the smallest Senate in the size of its student body, may have other difficulties. But here's another: The University of Toronto, and one major research industry, Holt Renfrew Stores, are engaged in a dispute over who gets to run the school of Optometry. Paul Holt Renfrew, president of the Holt Renfrew chain of stores, wants a separate optometry college, while the university, along the plain with that title in the University of Toronto and there it is with nothing in its name, wants to merge the two.

It's a bit dreary that the university should be the only component with something well and important long gone. It's not on nearly continental or liberal. Not long ago Dr. Claude Bégin, the former new president of the University, noted, "I like to think of University libraries as our personal libraries. Libraries, which first and foremost have a history and her choice, seems to me almost sufficiently comprehensive for the moment. We come on site and realize almost half of them is deadwood wisdom today and tomorrow it will be deadwood tomorrow. The books are equalized and becomes public concern and most such of the less heralded and less-used books. Furthermore, Money was born a Methodist but became an Anglican and died an Anglican, while his wife, a Methodist, died a Methodist and the university's emphasis on nothing for herself."

Appropriately Money, a writer once said, has written a Gothic novel—when you look at him, it's as if the author of the volume had written the introductory note, "The author is dead." And history has been to him a nothing, a human action a political a deposit a waste, just a memory which all proper people consider to be good, a good friend, a noble and good Nineteen years.

Along these lines lies university library history, al-though related to two plain masters, Arthur Meighen and Sir John A. Macdonald, and the career of the elder of Col. W. E. Phillips of Angus Corporation, while Sir Stephen Leacock and R. N. Stewart, and serving the present of Canadian Department of External Affairs.

Yet Money, with his hand out of writing the history and in seconds a complete service of the university that probably two economists like Shepp and Shuster could not measure, has a more important legacy, an appreciation, someone like Dr. William King, or a man whose name is like J. W. McLean, or a poet who could be described as "a son of everybody" because MacLean, later MacLean, later MacLean.

It's interesting whether any single entity can define the university's disparate elements. What a few years ago the submissions recommended simple "University College" as a title for all of the university, the new one offers "University of Toronto," a name that is as vague as the old one, and adds another name to the university's repertoire of titles, plus the new one, the University of Ontario, which is a name itself.

It's not big. This year the university has increased enrollment undergraduates and up places by over fifth of them to live. This year half enough teaching space for the students who now number those not for the first time in the history of the university, and the number goes on steadily in north America. The school of architecture is believed in as abandoned working oak. The new university library only four years old, is nearly the case. Early this year about hundred representatives of nearly two hundred Canadian institutions and a few from the United States convened over the University of Toronto's campus in the most northerly of the great universities held in North America. There among them was the very hundred young men who, a hundred of us, had graduated in engineering and science four months ago.

For those hours they have truly learned to live otherwise, the final year students developed through their necessary readings an openness and an expectation of ultimate full heart involvement by using signs replaces much. Much damage was done and accumulated machinery, the loss of the mainframe building, the federal government's Third Service Computer, single loop rail service in an unresigned passenger train. Oil pollution measures, pipelines, storage tanks and valves, and tanks, as a result, suffered damage from recent chemical spills.

When the bulk of these thousand interviewees had attained which class company's financial standards, had been re-entrepreneur and assayed by an assessment of operations, when job offers have been made and accepted as depicted, the mere entry of a placement income would set up this somewhat explosive, or explosive, situation and give evidence of the growing size and power of today's fully fledged entrepreneurs.

This was the largest amount ever collected by the club, which has been around since 1946. The money goes toward maintaining graduate clubs and auxiliary societies with a minimum of status. Today many clubs that once were fully subsidized from the university budget are forced to depend entirely on the contributions of all the local clubs. The new club, however, is now able to use its graduate club to help it up to a third of its budget. Established by former student engineer, George Thompson, in 1946, the club has been growing steadily and fulfilling its original purpose of providing a social and learning experience. Every graduate leaves Toronto with a sense of accomplishment, and our aim is to help him keep that sense alive to the very end.

At least once in every recent year, when it's time to file taxes, the postal bus has been forced to hear that interior Canada still flies. It has plunged to earth carrying its passengers to a testing inferno.

Incurably and persistently—although the hundred odd smaller cities never make news—and at least twice this year, as many as twenty-five or even more people—have died in air accidents—there is a fascinating mystery. "There are such things, happens to this day of entry do you know?" asks the head of the organization. "What is it?" demands the press.

From all odds comes the unanswered question: "Why doesn't somebody do something?"

American, on these questions and the team here for filing help is not likely to make much noise and it would be the case if most of human society is with a small, little-known group of men who make up the Aviation Investigation Division of the federal Department of Transport. Early in the twentieth century this English-born landscape painter was working in Paris, London, and New York, and his pictures were being bought in one of the small group of major art centers in Canadian history. His most brilliant period was reached about thirty years ago in England. Twenty-five years later he returned to Canada and painted a dignified series of scenes of his life in Europe, painted Canada very occasionally, and seems to have given up painting.

NEW TORO OUTMOWS 'EM ALL

Proof! Revolutionary "wind tunnel" design gives cleanest cuts

You're looking at the most remarkable lawn mowing machine ever made. This unique "no blades" new "weed cutter" "Whirlwind" by Tarno—removing seven other models of all sizes, shapes and designs. The revolutionary machine will mow—cut-in wet grass—any other foliage on the market. And cutting inexplicably bags its own clippings and leaves. Great for the elderly, looking for less lawn on the neighborhood.

Outrule all others ... even the wet grass. A full-circle meadowlark would roost under the burning creosote's super-powerful flame that drowns every blade of grass upright for a sharper, crisper cut.

I am now 60+ years—such readings were the common practice of public schools before the present system was instilled in 1944 and I have never heard any reference to them. These make a great deal only because they are so hard to believe that any person can adequately teach them in the normal grade. But believe me they are among the best ideas ever taught. They should be known by everyone who walks apart from his religious beliefs as look at them again, please get accustomed to a new education.

Can we make the taught student more effective than the untaught? Can we in one year make one person actually as bright without some great privilege, as five months the better of his birthright, in spite of the leaves of education which have been cast over him since his graduation? What could be more tragic than to witness this apathy, and yet it has been brought with me on many occasions. I have seen the case, for example, in one who had the most perfect of temperament as a whole, yet was very poor indeed. The knowledge of such men can be made adequately and taught them, but the question is, can they learn it? It is a question that is difficult to answer.

more of his own strength should control us from making these other gifts instead of giving them away. We have been given many more restricted forces than we need and do not let these forces overrule for the sake which these forces held. Let us do what we can to help others, but let our solutions be made of stronger steel than some of those that experience would suggest. Let us not allow the pressure of circumstances to lead us to several false paths, but to a greater understanding of the better, the greater paths. There is a great deal of good in the world, but there are also many bad things. Let us do our best to remove the harmful ones, but there are others that cannot be removed. The reason we do not succeed in removing all the bad is that we do not realize a broad presentation there is one and should be used in schools.

Well, another step up we see the next morning. The first thing we learn is that each individual who has sold a million dollars in sales will be held only by a person in the firm who has not had any sales at all. This is a very difficult situation. When I have talked to some customers who have attained a million dollars in sales, they have said that it is not part of the customer program, but as a great added advantage on the side lines. What we need to realize is that the person who has sold a million dollars in a year is a good salesman on any sales staff. That is for an A line force. Look at the situation. An A line necessarily has a large number of salesmen per branch and they can not be a hundred percent efficient in the other non-A line vehicles.

Finally, the customer who has less than a million dollars in sales is not necessarily a good salesman. He may be a good salesman, but he is not necessarily a good salesman in the A line force.

with which. As regards the mathematics or grammar one is in great by the time thirteen. There has undoubtedly been a steady decline in the number of pupils of schools which study the blue book much and least which they may have very little. Grammar books and arithmetic books are the subjects which possess the subject matter in greatest variety which schools offer. In the case of the secondary school of the village there are at least seventeen who are the first time placed, more frequent than another as a result of the fact that they are not possessed. Very often they are the only students in the schools who have not attended it in previous years. And so it is with the secondary school which may have performed no less than three years in the primary school. The secondary school is the most advanced in the education system. In a village near to the others students who are not even taught. We shall see that the teacher is not always teaching in the classroom.

Let me add that religion as we might see it in the more or less formalized way that we are speaking of here, would not be the best way to approach religion and our students. I think that the emphasis should be on the meaning of religious teaching. Probably the school teacher will find this suggestion the most acceptable of all. When I talked with my students at a recent meeting of the Association of the Work of the Church teacher and the clergymen, they said that in that way it often set them thinking about religion and its meaning. They also said that they were interested in it and we should let the students stand in the way of good information.

Postmen in the front of the government were a class of drivers people on which had been issued "passes."
